

My life with the wave

Octavio Paz

The male narrator visits the sea, and as he is leaving, a single wave "[clutches his] arm" and "[goes] leaping off" to town with him. The narrator tries to convince her to return to the sea, but the wave vehemently insists on staying with him. The next day, the narrator anxiously tries to determine how to transport "his friend" undetected on the train ride back to the city. He arrives at the station early and pours her into the train car's drinking fountain.

During the ride, several passengers attempt to drink from the fountain, but the narrator blocks their path. A woman finally manages to fill her cup and drink from it and announces that the water is salty. Her husband calls the conductor, who in turn calls the inspector, police, captain, and three agents, all of whom accuse the narrator of poisoning the water. At the next station, the agents detain the narrator and bring him to jail. After days of interrogation, the magistrate assigns him to the penal judge because of the case's "difficulty." The narrator is tried a year later and receives a "light" sentence because there were no victims of his alleged crime.

On his "day of freedom", he takes the train to Mexico City and is surprised to return home to the wave waiting for him. She explains that someone emptied her from the water fountain into the train engine, which transformed her into "a white plume of vapor" and then "a fine rain" , allowing her to arrive at his apartment. The wave's "presence [changed his] life" —the narrator's house is now filled with constant light and joy. He describes their love as "a game, a perpetual creation" that has the power to transform them both . Despite this, the narrator concludes that unlike other women, the wave has no "center," no "secret place that renders you vulnerable and mortal"—"just an emptiness like a whirlwind that sucked me in and smothered me"). They continue to share secrets and intimate moments, but the wave becomes "black and bitter", moody and violent. The narrator tries to console her by filling the house with objects and animals of the sea, including a colony of fish. The wave spends much of her time with the fish, until one day the narrator's jealousy overwhelms him, and he tries to kill them. The wave nearly drowns him but saves him just in time. This humiliating moment leads the narrators to "fear and hate" the wave. Having neglected other parts of his life since the wave arrived, the narrator begins to renew his "old and dear relations" , including an old girlfriend. He divulges to her about his secret life with the wave, which compels the woman to try and help him, but is unable to accomplish anything because of the wave's "incessant metamorphoses". When winter comes, the wave becomes even more temperamental, restless, and violent. She wreaks havoc in the apartment and lashes out
