ORANGUTANS AND THE RAINY, HOT RAINFOREST

Orangutans are large, orange mammals that live in the rainforests of Southeast Asia. These rainforests are very hot and rainy, which is why they are called tropical rainforests. The temperature in these places can be as high as 80°F (27°C) during the day! Rain is also very common, and it can rain almost every day. Orangutans have thick, orange fur that helps them stay safe and warm in the rain. They live in the tall trees of the forest, where they build nests out of branches to sleep in.

The rainforests where orangutans live are full of tall trees, vines, and plants. These forests are so humid that the air feels damp, and it can rain for days, making everything wet. The hot temperatures and constant rain make this environment special, but it also means that the weather changes a lot. Some days might be very hot and sunny, while other days could be thunderstorms with lots of rain.

To understand the weather in places like the rainforests, scientists use tools like thermometers, humidity sensors, and rain gauges. A thermometer measures the temperature, which tells us how hot or cold it is. A rain gauge measures how much rain has fallen. Scientists also use clouds and wind to predict the weather, so people can get ready for what the weather will be like.

Understanding the weather in places like the rainforests is important because it helps us learn more about the world and how to protect it. For example, knowing the weather can help us decide when to plant crops or when to build houses.

NARRATIVE

RAINY DAY IN THE RAINFOREST

It was a rainy day in the rainforest. The sun had disappeared behind thick, grey clouds, and the air was heavy with moisture. The rain fell in steady, soft drops, creating a gentle rhythm. The trees were wet, their leaves glistening with raindrops. The ground was also wet, and the sound of water dripping from the leaves was everywhere.

As the rain continued to fall, the forest felt like a giant, living organism. The trees were breathing, and the air was thick with the scent of wet earth. The rain was so loud that it seemed like the forest was shouting. The trees were shaking, and the leaves were falling. The rain was so heavy that it seemed like the forest was drowning.

The rain was so loud that it seemed like the forest was shouting. The trees were shaking, and the leaves were falling. The rain was so heavy that it seemed like the forest was drowning.
