United States Air Force Research Report

February 7, 2011

Executive Summary The United States Air Force has been able to carry on a great tradition of air supremacy and advanced technology. They were born in September 1947, when they separated from the Army Air Core, and became their own unit (www.peterson.af.mil). Providing for the troops that serve always has been a top priority of the Air Force. The Air Force is run in management form, just like any large organization, or small business. It has a rank structure, where tasks are delegated down from the ranking Officers through the Enlisted Core. After significant evaluation, I have researched and identified the following six categories necessary for the Air Force to preserve ... Show more content on Helpwriting.net ...

Competition within the Air Force is similar to real-world businesses. Making rank equals more money and respect. In the Marines and the Army, it is much easier to make rank. To properly compete, the AF needs to recognize possible issues that may drive their hardworking employees to another branch, or even separate from the military entirely. Management understands that improvement on their employee's happiness is critical in completing the mission. The military members have no incentive to work harder besides fear of reprimand, or paperwork. The military has great job security; a person needs make a serious mistake to be discharged. Therefore, the AF understands they need to keep their people happy and take care of them so the mission can be delivered. Upper management needs to assert certain ways to collect data such as surveys, to see how they can help their troops. Anonymous surveys are important because they may lead to more honest answers discussing problems that they may not address otherwise (Cooper & Schindler, 2006). Another way to seek out possible issues is conduct focus groups. Conducting qualitative and quantitative research using focus groups could be insightful, gathering pertinent data from the people in each workplace (Cooper & Schindler, 2006). This research will lead to a better perception for what needs to be focused on the most. Action needs to be taken quickly by senior leadership so the workers see that they are not a low
