William Price Drury,1903 By Neva's Waters: Being an Episode in the Secret History of Alexander the First, Czar of All the Russias John R. Carling,1644-01-01 On a cold January night in the first year of the nineteenth century a state ball given by command of the fair young queen Louisa was held in the Royal Palace at Berlin Of those who attended this festive many chiefly of the masculine sex were indifferent to polonaise or waltz finding their entertainment in the galleries where

somewhat after the fashion of a modern restaurant stood little tables at which parties of two or more while glancing at the dancers could at the same time regale themselves with a supper and converse upon the topics of the day This was a feature recently introduced by the Russian Count Wengersky and though Court fossils stood aghast at the innovation it had met with the approval of Queen Louisa and had brought immense popularity to the Count In one of these balconies sat round a table some officers who though of youthful aspect were more interested in politics than in the charms of the ladies Their talk which was extremely animated turned chiefly upon the question whether their sovereign lord Frederick William III would permit himself to be drawn into the confederacy formed by the four Powers France Russia Sweden and Denmark a confederacy whose object was to resist by armed force the right claimed by Great Britain of searching on the high seas all vessels suspected of carrying contraband of war As these fire eaters talked they cast cautious glances in the direction of Viscount Courtenay an Englishman who sat alone at a table sipping his wine A member of a famous historic house and patriotic to the backbone the quick spirited viscount was not the man to allow any disparagement of his country to pass unchallenged and as his reputation for swordsmanship was such as not to be disputed even by Fighting Fitzgerald then in the height of his glory the Prussian officers took good care that any remark uncomplimentary to his native land should be spoken in a low tone Wilfrid Courtenay s life should have been cast in the Middle Ages He was a romantic freelance whose ideas were more akin to the age of chivalry than to the nineteenth century The spirit that finds a zest in danger the spirit that made the vikings the terror of all coasts from the North Cape to Sicily the spirit that sent the Crusaders forth to do battle with the Paynim beneath the blazing sun of Syria the spirit that has caused Englishmen to plant colonies in the very teeth of hostile savages that spirit still ran strong in the blood of the Courtenays Accordingly on the attainment of his majority Wilfrid leaving to his widowed mother the care of his patrimonial acres had set out like a knight errant to wander over Europe in search of adventure in which quest he had fleshed his sword in more than one campaign earning thereby from no less a personage than the Count d Artois himself a pattern of chivalry the proud title of Le Bayard de l Angleterre
