run off hydrogen more efficiently and be far cleaner than conventional gas powered vehicles As production of fossil fuels slows and proven reserves fall prices will rise and alternative sources will become economically competitive with fossil fuels Nuclear geothermal wind PV and wave energy will all be needed to provide for the total global energy demands A hydrogen platform will also be developed through this century for the transportation sector Hydrogen will serve as an energy carrier for vehicles and will be used as a form of chemical storage for energy in stationary applications produced most likely by off peak excess power Based on the above information all countries in the world can be analyzed to assess their potential to become early adopters for hydrogen energy Even though a basic statistical approach might not provide very accurate results it provides an insight on early adopters and the status of countries in terms of several commonly measured properties
