

Chemical Reactions

Big Idea: What is a chemical change, and how do you know one has occurred?

Have you ever popped popcorn in a microwave and left it in for too long? When this happens, you get a distinct smell, and the popcorn at the bottom looks black. This is because a chemical reaction has occurred.

Diagram 1

Corn kernels being heated for 2 minutes to create popcorn is a physical change. The popcorn is still corn.

Corn kernels being heated for 2 minutes to create popcorn and burn some of the kernels. These burnt pieces represent a chemical change. The burnt pieces are not longer corn.

Physical Change vs. Chemical Change

There is one main difference between a physical change and a chemical change. In a physical change, the substance changes its form, but it is still the same substance. An example of a physical change is when you place water in the freezer and it turns to ice. The ice is still made up of water molecules; they are just in a solid state instead of a liquid state. In a chemical change, the substance actually changes and turns into something new. When you burn popcorn, the burnt pieces are no longer corn (Diagram 1). They are a new substance that has been created when the corn, water, and oxygen combine with a lot of heat. This is why a food label is given off and the popcorn turns black. Color and a new change are indicators that a chemical change has occurred.
