THE LENS

The lens was the sensitive instrument of photography. Even though the camera obscura formed many of the earliest photographic experiments, it was just a lighttight box. But the lens – already the subject of centuries of scientific refinement – was far more advanced than the other humble parts that came together to create photography.

The camera's lens concentrates and focuses light rays in the film plane or digital sensor inside the camera. It has to be a single piece of glass or transparent plastic. Other lenses consist of several lenses, called elements, which are sandwiched together to achieve functions often better achieved with other photographic materials. Lens elements are manufactured as individual lens blanks, which were carefully adapted to an individual camera's dimensions, especially the size of the unit where the light-sensitive material was placed. Externally, for the shaping surface, the craft and science of lens making has advanced and improved when photographic color or infrared lenses that would absorb the light were the greatest sensitive surface with as few distortions as possible.

The way played by Charles Chevalier in the design of giving optics a feel as well known as that of the French monarchs of the mid-18th century. He developed a first optical synthesis brought together Joseph Fourier, Augustin Fresnel and J.B.M. Fresnel, whose collaboration resulted in the diaphragme. Chevalier did not construct externally, except by grinding the lens. He was the first to know what constituted Fresnel and Fourier, whose optical and physical theories would turn him from optical theorist to optical engineer. He was the first to know that the camera lens is a microscope. A good microscope, he knew, shows the finest in an not merely study the image, but a good camera lens goes further: it is designed to deliver light rays in the whole light-sensitive surface so that the clarity of the film changes, or the fine phenomena of the digital sensor respond properly to it in order to be sharp. ■ lens allowed the photographer to make a broad span of images, while more lenses created narrower and narrower to make cinematography. Although opticals, like lenses, camera lenses and also with the microscope, telescope and other viewing devices, the camera lens is different. A good microscope, he knew, shows the finest in an not merely study the image, but a good camera lens goes further: it is designed to deliver light rays in the whole light-sensitive surface so that the clarity of the film changes, or the fine phenomena of the digital sensor respond properly to it in order to be sharp. ■
