Czechoslovakia consisted of a number of mixed nationalities artificially amalgamated into a nation by the peacemakers of 1919. During 1938 Hitler presented himself as the defender of the so-called 'oppressed minority' of Sudeten Germans. Chamberlain believed that the Czech problem had to be solved by negotiation. On 22 September 1938, the self-styled 'messenger of peace' took Hitler the news of the Czech agreement to hand the Sudetenland over to Germany. But he then found that Hitler had new demands, which included an immediate German occupation of the Sudetenland. Astonishingly Chamberlain was even willing to agree with this. The later Munich Conference simply agreed to the Sudetenland being peacefully incorporated into Germany. It seems Hitler, despite gaining the Sudetenland without firing a shot, was dissatisfied with Munich and was eager to push ahead with his own desire to occupy the remainder of Czechoslovakia at the earliest opportunity. In a separate meeting, Chamberlain persuaded Hitler to sign a piece of paper which declared that Britain and Germany would 'never go to war with one another again'. To Hitler, it was a worthless piece of paper.

The Munich agreement was celebrated as a triumph for Chamberlain but not everyone agreed. The Soviet Union believed that Britain and France were happy so long as Hitler moved eastward. The seeds of the later Nazi-Soviet Pact were probably planted in the mind of Stalin at the time of Munich. In Britain the cheers and acclaim for Chamberlain were symbolic of a deep longing to avoid a second world war.
