The Science of Rainbows

What is a Rainbow?

A rainbow might seem like a fantasy in the mythical world of dragons and fairies instead of the natural world, but there's real science behind the magical display of colors in the sky. In fact, rainbows are made of light. Refraction—bending of light that moves or disperses when it goes from one medium to another—occurs when sunlight enters a water droplet.

For a rainbow to appear, you must be facing away from the sun, and the sunlight must encounter airborne water droplets at a low enough angle. (This is why rainbows happen most often in the morning or later afternoon.) As white light enters a water droplet, it refracts, or bends, into different colors, and this results in the dazzling rainbow colors you see. Rainbows can be dim or bright, depending on the sun, and they can appear in a period time or all day long. They can also be seen in a variety of places, from a garden to a lake (and) in a variety of weather conditions.

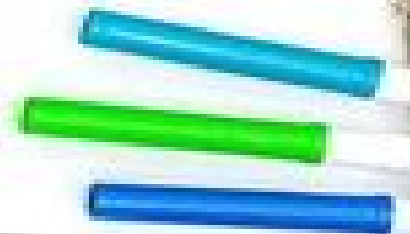

Remember that light is made of many colors. A beam of white light is made of many colors. A beam of white light is made of many colors.
