Paper 1 Core Physical Geography

General comments

This was the first examination based on the revised syllabus and papers, and the results, in general, were most encouraging. Centres have built on the experiences of recent years, and most candidates displayed a clear understanding of the physical concepts involved. There was a full range of quality seen.

Much of the teaching is obviously of high quality, and excellent marks were achieved by a significant number of candidates. The examination proved successful in testing these able candidates, but was also fair to candidates over a range of abilities. Candidates generally coped well with the demands of the new style examination and there were very few rubric errors. Planning, in terms of time allocation, was effective, and only a few candidates were unable to complete the examination in the time allocated.

All questions were answered, but 'Hydrology and fluvial geomorphology' proved the most popular topic in Section B. It is clear that 'Atmosphere and weather' continues to be the least popular choice for the majority of candidates, but some of the answers offered were of commendable quality. Now that this topic is a compulsory part of Section A, it is to be hoped that, in the future, more candidates will be sufficiently knowledgeable and confident to choose 'Atmosphere and weather' in Section B.

The use and accuracy of maps and diagrams remains variable, and such skills would benefit from further focus and development. Using an illustrative diagram would greatly enhance an answer. All answers to questions in Section B could have been improved by the appropriate use of diagrams.

A variety of command words may appear in questions, but in this examination, the three that dominated were 'describe', 'explain' and 'assess'. There is consistency in the demands of individual questions. In Section A, the part (b) questions generally require description, whilst the part (c) questions require explanation. There were many excellent answers, but some candidates offered explanations when only descriptions were demanded. In Section B, evaluation and assessment are dominant features, either explicitly or implicitly. All 15-mark questions lead candidates into some level of evaluation, and this was not always forthcoming. Level 3 and 4 responses are often identified through the detail and sophistication of the assessment.

The use of examples can do much to enhance an answer, even if not specifically required. Case studies can offer greater depth and detail than simple examples, but may, in themselves, not cover the range of ideas that a question demands.

The source material provided in Section A was, in general, competently used by the majority of candidates, although there was a variation between questions.

This was generally a most encouraging examination in terms of the knowledge and understanding of the candidates. The approach was thorough and effective, and this first experience of the new examination will provide a solid foundation for future candidates.
