Cookies Versus Brownies

Both cookies and brownies have delicious qualities that make them ideal for a dessert or snack. By examining the features that differentiate cookies and brownies, the reader will be able to form an educated opinion of which dessert he/she prefers. In the following paragraphs, we will compare and contrast cookies and brownies by examining their texture, sweetness, and overall versatility.

In general, cookies have a crunchier texture than brownies, and brownies tend to have a softer and cakier texture than cookies. There are several reasons for this difference, but the overarching reasoning for the difference is the ingredients used in the recipes. Betty Crocker's 1959 classic, The Cookbook of 1500 Recipes, states, "To create a softer, more delectable brownie, you must add 8 tablespoons of margarine, 2 cups of milk and 3 eggs. This will impart a moist, cake-like texture into your brownie" (192). Because brownies contain more liquid and fat, they have a higher likelihood of maintaining a moist consistency, proving the fact that brownies are generally softer. Conversely, cookies contain nearly half as many wet ingredients, and nearly double as many dry ingredients: Crocker states, "To make a perfectly crisp cookie, add 4 tablespoons of margarine, 1 egg, and 1 teaspoon of milk. Use two cups of sifted flour...to obtain a yummy, crunchy texture" (139). The two pieces of textual evidence show how the ingredients affect the outcome of the desserts' textures. Equally important to brownies' and cookies' yumminess is their sweetness.
