

1-4 DESCRIPTION AND OPERATION

Newton meters. The greater the velocity of water mass moving through the nozzle, the greater the thrust to move the craft.

Cooling System

A fitting on the jet pump, aft of the impeller, syphons off cooling water. This water is delivered first to the exhaust manifold -- the hottest part of the engine. The water is then channeled around the cylinder walls, cylinder head, and exhaust pipe. Some water is mixed with exhaust gases in the tuned exhaust pipe and finally discharged from the exhaust outlet. This mixture of water and exhaust gases has the effect of cooling and somewhat quieting the exhaust emission.

1-4 IMPELLERS

Impellers provide thrust using a combination of water flow and water pressure in a closed environment.

The blades of an impeller overlap, thus water is trapped and forced through the impeller into the pump case and nozzle. The water moving past the impeller resists cavitation because it is under pressure. Blades in the pump case are angled exactly opposite to those of the impeller. These blades redirect the water to establish a concentrated flow through the nozzle.

The vanes in the pump case straighten water flow and the conical shape of the outlet nozzle increases flow velocity.

The manufacturer recommends a radius of about 1/64" (0.3-0.5mm) for the leading edge of the impeller blade. A sharper radius will result in cavitation and a greater radius will reduce pump efficiency.

Cavitation Burns

Cavitation burns are the worst enemy of an impeller. These burns literally "eat away" material from the impeller, leaving holes and weakening the impeller structure. In extreme cases entire blades have been known to "depart" from the impeller hub because the cavitation burns at the base of the blade were so severe.

Cavitation burns are the result of imperfections (damage) on the impeller blades or air mixed with the water flow.

Cavitation burns may be caused by:

Wave jumping -- air is sucked into the pump as the craft leaves the surface of the water.

Bad seal between the pump case and outlet nozzle -- allowing air to enter.

Leading edge of the impeller becoming damaged.

To explain exactly what causes cavitation burns, first, let us examine the last cause. If the impeller leading edge is damaged and "mushrooms" over the blade, a low pressure area will form under the mushroomed lip.

The impeller of a jet pump is a precisely machined and dynamically balanced aluminum spiral. Significant damage to a blade will affect the balance.
