

AC Aceca-AC

Introduced for 1955, the Aceca was a grand touring coupé version of the Ace, offering more luxury than the roadster that fully justified its extra cost. The basic chassis followed the lines of the Ace, but with heavier-duty main rails, an extra crossmember and rubber mountings for the differential to reduce the amount of road noise transmitted to the cabin. For similar reasons, glassfibre front and rear bulkheads were used. Rather than the tubes of the Ace, doors and tailgate were wood-framed in the traditional manner. Rarity helps keep values strong.

AC Ace-Bristol

From 1954, those who had criticised the Ace for its lack of power got an answer (though it was to be the first of many). Bristol's 'six' of similar capacity was bought in. Of slightly newer and more sophisticated design, most were supplied in 128bhp spec, though a few were delivered with 125 or even 105bhp. The better Bristol gearbox was also used, with overdrive a popular option. They were sold at a price premium alongside other Aces and one was driven to the 1959 Le Mans 24 Hours, winning the 2.0-litre class and finishing seventh overall. Values surging recently.

AC Aceca-Bristol

In line with the Ace, a Bristol-engined version of the Aceca was added from 1956. Though markedly more expensive than the AC-engined car, it was a much better performer and outdid the lesser car, with 169 leaving the factory. As with all Acecas, you get details such as two rows of four louvres in the bonnet, burr walnut instrument surrounds and glovebox lid, and hinged rear side windows to aid ventilation. Though the car was directly related to the Ace, and had a similar nose and grille, no body panels are the same on both cars. Values holding.

AC Greyhound

Stylish and dignified four-seat big brother to the Aceca, also panelled in aluminium and fitted with all the same engine choices, though in reality most ordered used the Bristol straight-six, either in 2.0- or 2.2-litre form. No more than three are thought to have received the Zephyr 2.6. Despite a change to coil springs for independent suspension, handling isn't a match for the Aceca and, although only a quarter as many were built as the smaller car, they have never set the market alight in the same way and can be bought for about half as much.

AC Ace RS 2.6

Introduced in 1961 and originally a Ruddspeed conversion – hence the 'RS' – this used the cheap and cheerful 2.6-litre six-cylinder engine from a MkII Ford Zephyr. Depending on which state of tune the customer ordered, output could be up to 170bhp (Stage 3, with aluminium head and triple Weber). Even in that most potent form it was still cheaper than the Bristol-engined Ace. Now up to Ace-Bristol prices, only 37 were built and they're recognised by a new nose and grille that would soon adorn Cobras – along with a further eight Aceca coupés. On the up.
