

LESSONS FROM FAILURE: WHY WE TRY, TRY AGAIN

Your mindset after facing failure can make all the difference

by Bethany Brookshire • 2015

FONT SIZE A A A A

In this informational text, Bethany Brookshire discusses a study that explores how people respond to failure and what makes them try again. As you read, take notes on what makes people try again after failure.

1 Everyone experiences failures. But not everyone brushes themselves off and tries again. A new study shows that focusing on what can be learned from a failure appears to help people persevere 1 - with a better chance of success the next time.

Jamil Sharif is neuroscientist 2 at Rutgers University in Brunswick, N.J. There are two main parts to any challenge that may cause someone to fail, he says. First, there are the aspects a person can control. Whether students study for a test, for instance, is under their control. But there also are aspects outside people's control. Getting sick could make someone too tired to study, even if he might want to.

No matter what causes a setback, there can be many ways to cope, 3 Sharif explains. One way is to concentrate on what led to the failure in the first place. If someone fails a test, a problem-focused approach might be to study more or better the next time.

But people who fail can also try focusing on emotions, says Sharif. The test-taker might feel bad now, but he can convince himself that things will look brighter in the morning. Sharif describes that as an emotion-focused approach.
