His last work, The Great American Novel (1976), examined the history of American fiction. He was an able and tireless lecturer at NYU, where many recalled his personal and often off-the-wall speeches delivered with a charmingly boisterous and bawdy wit. He also lectured at other universities, and his lectures were sought and taught with the enthusiasm at his home. Both the content and style of his lectures, however, were unique and highly original. The way we think about the American past and contemporary life has been shaped and reshaped by his observations, mostly by the University of Iowa. He was invited in 1975 to deliver the Distinguished Lecture in the Humanities and gave a memorable lecture on the American West that day. He left the U.S. to continue his work, mostly in the politics and literature. Following his wife's death in 1980, he returned to Iowa, where he spent the last days of his life. He was a great teacher, a great lecturer, a great person, and a great man. He was a great man, a great teacher, a great lecturer, a great person, and a great man.
