Husain,Mousumi Dutta,2016-11-04 This book analyses the reasons for relying on behavioural contraception methods among urban elites in India and examines their efficacy in controlling fertility It also traces variations in contraception choice over the reproductive cycle of women Although researchers and policy makers generally equate reliance on behavioural contraceptive methods with low levels of education and awareness and lack of desire to control fertility this perception has been questioned in recent years The authors analysis of the first three rounds of the National Family Health Survey NFHS data in India reveals that behavioural contraceptive methods are popular in eastern India Moreover it is urban educated women who rely on behavioural methods and are apparently able to regulate fertility quite effectively with such methods NFHS data however has some limitations and this motivates the authors to explore birth control methods through primary surveys of currently married graduate women in Kolkata The use of behavioural contraception methods is a little researched area globally and this is the first book focusing on the topic in India

The German Energy Transition Andreas Coester, 2025-05-28 The industrial activities that our modern civilization depends upon have increased CO₂ and other greenhouse gas emissions significantly There is considerable consensus that this increase in emissions has been contributing to climate change In order to limit global warming a comprehensive and fast transition to lower emissions in all industrial sectors is crucial Despite the strong increase in renewable energies capacity over the past years there are various challenges associated with the further transition to a 100% renewable energies supply One of the challenges is the fluctuating supply of renewable energies due to the intermitted nature of wind and sunshine Another challenge arises from the low marginal costs of renewable energies that lead to a reduction of the electricity price which impairs a profitable operation of both conventional and renewable energies power plants Against this backdrop the main question of this research is which policy scenario can ensure an economic efficient and ongoing expansion of renewable energies together with a secure level of electricity supply The research focusses on Germany as Germany has to find sustainable and economically feasible policy scenarios in the short term due to its strong expansion of renewable energies and its decision to phase out both nuclear and coal power plants
