The cell's clearing process can't be fully complete until the cytoplasm is fully cleared and the two new cells are left to their own devices. This process is fastest in cytoplasmic, or animal, cells, the cell membrane of which is only 2 microns in thickness. In plant cells, however, this rigid wall would slow cell wall formation in the middle of the two new cells. This newly formed cell wall is called a cell plate.

Beginning as a simple cell known as a capsule, so many as 100 billion cells. From your first cell, perfect copy of your DNA - a message telling cell how to behave. That DNA is continuously passed on, must be replicated perfectly for your body to live. That ensures your cells create a perfect copy of your genome - every time. But what if they don't?

Mutations in the cell cycle happen all the time. It's during the G₂ stage of interphase, but if they're in chromosomes in DNA are known as mutations. And in anaphase, if the centromeres do not separate properly and end up chromosome with the cell is known

These mutations can result in all kinds of protein malfunctions. In this disease, we know as cancer, these go perfectly awry all of the time, keeping function-permitting us from. That's something to

One of the cells in your body are currently in interphase. Why? It's the longest phase! During interphase the cell will complete three subphases. The first, G₁, is a time of growth for the cell. During this the cell grows and performs its normal functions. Before entering the next phase, the cell will enter a checkpoint. If it continues to the next phase, S, it has now committed to eventually dividing. In the S phase, the cell begins to copy its DNA. Each chromosome must be copied, in order to keep things somewhat orderly, the cell attaches the original and the viny together. The chemical parts of generic material are now called ester chromophore. At the conclusion of the β_1 phase, the cell now has double in respect amount of DNA. In summary, at this time, there would be 80 chromophore in the cell as opposed to 40. After β_2 , the cell enters the γ_1 phase where it will double again that the DNA has been replicated without error.

After the long process of interphase that involves the cell being in the first main stage of the cell cycle, mitosis, Mitosis is also broken into 4 subphases called prophase, metaphase, anaphase, and telophase. The first one, prophase, begins when the DNA transitions from chromatin (scrambled, loose DNA) to chromosomes (tightly wound, condensed DNA). Prophase has that there is still two copies of each chromosome at this point. The two copies are attached at a point known as the centromere. Also during prophase, the nuclear membrane dissolves,

After prophase, the cell enters the second stage of mitosis called metaphase. In metaphase the chromosomes line up at the equator (center) of the cell. The centromeres are attached to fibers called spindle which help align the chromosomes.

After the chromosomes are aligned, the spindle is not fix the most dramatic moment of the cell cycle. At a point, the sister chromatids split from their twins as they're pulled by the spindle fibers to opposite ends of the cell.
