Teaching Transparency 28 – Energy Transfer Throughout the Atmosphere

1. the Sun
2. convection, conduction, radiation
3. A small percentage of solar radiation is absorbed by the atmosphere, heating it directly. A larger percentage of solar radiation is absorbed by Earth's surface. The surface then radiates energy, which is absorbed by the atmosphere, heating it.
4. Energy from heated particles of air near Earth's surface is transferred when these particles collide with air particles in the very lowest layer of the atmosphere.
5. Energy transferred by conduction to pockets of air near the surface is transferred by convection higher into the atmosphere.
6. Answers will vary. Without convection, energy would not reach the higher levels of the atmosphere, so the middle and upper sections of the troposphere would be colder. Most of the warmth would be concentrated near Earth's surface.
7. Air warmed near Earth's surface becomes less dense and rises. As it rises, the air expands and starts to cool. When it cools below the temperature of the surrounding air, it increases in density and sinks. As it sinks, it warms again and the process starts anew.

5. Major shifts in temperature occur at the boundaries between atmospheric layers.
6. No; the temperatures are all generally below freezing (0 degrees C), so they are too cold for people.

Teaching Transparency 30 – The Water Cycle

1. The water cycle is the constant movement of water between the atmosphere and Earth's surface.
2. Water evaporates from surface waters such as oceans, streams, and lakes and becomes water vapor in the atmosphere.
3. Water that evaporates from Earth's surface rises, cools, and condenses, forming cloud droplets +and clouds.
4. Water droplets in clouds combine and grow in size. Then they fall to Earth as precipitation.
5. It flows along the surface and then into streams, rivers, and other water bodies as runoff. It also soaks into the ground and becomes groundwater, which eventually flows into surface water bodies.
6. the Sun
7. Possible response: The water cycle allows Earth to continuously recycle its limited water supply, which is essential to life on Earth.

15. A temperature inversion is an increase in temperature with height in an atmospheric layer. On a clear, winter night where there is a rapid cooling of land, the lower layers of the atmosphere lose heat to Earth's surface. As a result, the lower layers of air become cooler than the air above.
16. Relative humidity is the ratio of water vapor in a volume of air relative to how much water vapor that volume of air is capable of holding at saturation.
