Bats

Have you heard the expression, "Blind as a bat"? It is completely false. All bats have good eyesight, but most don't use their eyes to hunt or fly at night.

Many years ago, scientists blindfolded some bats and discovered an amazing thing. The bats could still catch insects.

The scientists even strung a room with hundreds of piano wires and the bats flew about without bumping into them. In a pitch-black cave, thousands of bats can fly around without crashing into one another.

Bats fly by echolocation. They use echoes to find food and to avoid flying into obstacles in the dark. In a sense, bats "see" with their ears.

While flying, a bat sends out sounds from its mouth or nose. These sounds are short, high squeaks that bats can hear but humans can't.

These sounds bounce off objects and echo back to the bats' ears. Like a computer, the bat's brain can figure quickly and correctly the size, distance and movement pattern of an object.

Scientists all over the world are studying bat echolocation. There is a good reason. They hope to understand the built-in echolocation of bats, which works much better than any machine we have so far.
