How Does Magma Form?

Magma forms deep in the Earth's crust and in the upper parts of the mantle. In these areas, the temperature and pressure are very high. Changes in pressure and temperature can cause magma to form.

Part of the upper mantle is made of very hot, solid rock. The rock is so hot that it can flow, like soft chewing gum, even though it is solid. If rock of this temperature were found at the Earth's surface, it would be molten, or melted. The rock in the mantle does not melt because it is under high pressure. This pressure is produced by the weight of the rock above the mantle.

In the figure below, the curved line shows the melting point of a rock. The melting point is the temperature at which the rock melts for a certain pressure.

The curved line shows the melting point of the rock. Rock with the temperature and pressure of point A is liquid. Rock at the same temperature but higher pressure (B) is solid. Rock at the same pressure but lower temperature (C) is also solid.

STUDY TIP

Describe After you read this section, make flowcharts showing how magma forms at divergent boundaries and at convergent boundaries.

READING CHECK

1. Explain Why doesn't the hot rock in the mantle melt?

Math Focus

2. Describe A rock starts out at point C. Then, its temperature increases. What will happen to the rock if its temperature continues to rise?

MAGMA FORMATION IN THE MANTLE

The temperature of the mantle is fairly constant. Magma usually forms because of a decrease in pressure. Therefore, a lot of magma forms at the boundary between separating tectonic plates, where pressure decreases. Magma is less dense than the solid rock it forms from. Therefore, it rises toward the surface and erupts.
