Amino Acid Sequences: Evidence of Evolution

Scientists have gathered a variety of evidence to support the theory of evolution: fossil record, radioactive dating, coevolution, embryonic similarities, structural similarities, and biochemical similarities. Similarities in structure and biochemistry provide support for Darwin's conclusion: living organisms evolved through gradual modification of earlier forms, that is, descent from a common ancestor.

One biochemical similarity that can be studied is the similarity in amino acid sequences in homologous proteins of different organisms. The greater the similarity in amino acid sequences of homologous proteins the closer the evolutionary relationship; the greater the differences the more distant the relationship. You will study two proteins in vertebrates: hemoglobin and cytochrome c. Hemoglobin is the oxygen carrying molecules founds in red blood cells; it is composed of several long chains. The sequence used in this lab is a portion of a chain consisting of 146 amino acids. Cytochrome c is a respiratory enzyme found in mitochondria consisting of 104 amino acids.

Part I:

Examine Figure 1, which compares portions of hemoglobin molecules in humans and five other vertebrate animals. Hemoglobin, a protein composed of several long chains of amino acids, is the oxygen carrying molecule in red blood cells. Only a portion of the chain is shown in Figure 1.

- 1) Highlight the differences between humans and each of the other organisms; remember to compare humans versus the other species; do not compare adjacent rows
