
Introduction

Developmental psychology:

The sub-discipline within psychology that describes and explains the changes that people undergo over their whole lifespan

→ The human lifespan is divided into developmental stages or periods

→ The criteria for this subdivision are chronological age and biological indicators of developmental change

Example : 1. menarche (menstruation) 2. growth spurt at the beginning of the adolescent years and 3. menopause

Shortcomings of the subdivision :

1. First stages of development are based on northern american statistics and can therefore be misleading for south africa
2. Second stage of development ignores the differences in development of each individual. Actual development is much more complex than this approach would lead us to believe, because individuals sometimes grow in stops and starts and at other times they grow constantly
3. Third stages focuses on human biology however different environmental factors will affect this

Themes in developmental psychology :

1. Nature VS nurture : What roles do heredity and upbringing play in human development?
2. Sociocultural context : This considers the customs, values and beliefs that influence a child's upbringing. It includes the roles played by the parents' economic status and educational level
