There are around 800 million cars in the world nowadays, and in the US, for instance, 87% of working people commute by car (Thrun 99). The potential of autonomous cars to improve traffic safety is owed to a number of factors such as vehicle-vehicle communication, exchange of information with the cloud, communication of the vehicle with the street infrastructure (Holstein et al. 1,3). These can presumably enable instantaneous software upgrades or updates with regard to changing road traffic conditions (in a given geographical area) available for all vehicles or all nearby vehicles. Vehicle to vehicle communication can theoretically lead to collective (and hence, smarter) decisions taken by cars during a critical road traffic situation that might prove life-saving.

Also, because these vehicles integrate a multitude of sensors, like radars or LIDARS (laser radars), GPS modules (linked to detailed maps), ultra-sonic scanners, a big number of optical cameras, these can gather more useful information. Based on gathered information, very complex situations can be estimated in a blink of an eye and the appropriate decision can be taken – for instance, the car might detect in real time all moving cars nearby and their velocity, can estimate their trajectories and make an avoiding maneuver if there is a threat of
