The PCM currently ignores the speed with the LAC value. To increase the speed, the PCM will speed up the heater pump when the LAC value is below the LAC limit. A decrease will speed up the heater pump when the LAC value is above the LAC limit. The LAC value is used to control the heater pump. A "Low" read will send the PCM to increase the LAC value and a "High" read will send the PCM to decrease the LAC value. The LAC value is used to control the heater pump. 3. The IAC valve is used to control and adjust the engine's idling. Valve movement is verified by an engine speed change. If no change in engine speed occurs, the valve can be adjusted until increased engine speed is observed.
4. Then compare the location of the IAC movement in Step 3. Increase the rpm and adjust IAC until the engine speed doesn't change noticeably with each fourth of the turn; right in both forward and reverse. If the IAC valve is misadjusted toward the extreme (range left) IAC stop, it may take more than four in the reverse position before engine speed will begin to rise. This is normal on certain engines. Fully extending IAC may cause engine stall. This may be correct.
5. Steps 1 and 2 verified proper IAC valve operation, since they show that the IAC movement, when the rpm is held right should result in engine stalls while the IAC valve is turned. While the frequency is under 100 Hz (approximately 7500 rpm) the engine is under full throttle and must, then, the throttle the throttle, increasing and then decreasing engine speed.
