NONFICTION ORANGUTANS AND THE RAINY, HOT RAINFOREST

Orangutans are large, orange mammals that live in the rainforests of Southeast Asia. These rainforests are very hot and rainy, which is why they are called tropical rainforests. The temperature in these places can be as high as 80°F (27°C) during the day! Rain is also very common, and it can rain almost every day. Orangutans have thick, orange fur that helps them stay safe and warm in the rain. They live in the tall trees of the forest, where they build nests out of branches to sleep in.

The rainforests where orangutans live are full of tall trees, vines, and plants. These forests are so humid that the air feels damp, and it can even feel heavy, making everything wet. The hot temperatures and constant rain make this environment special, but it also means that the weather changes a lot. Some days might be very hot and sunny, while other days are thunderstorms with lots of rain.

To understand the weather in places like the rainforests, scientists use tools like thermometers, humidity sensors, and rain gauges. These tools help them measure the temperature, humidity, and amount of rain that falls. Scientists also use clouds and wind to predict the weather, so people can get ready for what the weather will be like.

Understanding the weather and the environment where orangutans live is important because it helps us learn how to protect them and their homes. We can use this information to make sure that the rainforests stay healthy and that orangutans can continue to live there.

NARRATIVE RAINY DAY IN THE RAINFOREST

It was a rainy day in the rainforest. The sun had hidden away behind thick, grey clouds. The rain fell in steady drops, creating a soft pattering sound. The air was warm and humid, with a hint of the earthy scent of the forest floor. The trees were lush and green, their leaves glistening with rain. The sound of the rain was soothing, a constant reminder of the life and vitality of the rainforest.

As the rain continued to fall, the forest came alive. The leaves rustled and danced in the wind, creating a symphony of nature. The air was filled with the sound of water hitting leaves, branches, and the ground. The rain was a gift, bringing life and nourishment to the forest. The trees drank it up, their roots reaching down into the earth to absorb the moisture. The rain was a blessing, a reminder of the power of nature.
