

Objectives

- Investigate the body's digestion of starch
- Investigate the digestion of fat
- Investigate the effect of emulsifiers on fat digestion
- Investigate the effect that changes in body conditions, such as temperature or pH have on digestion

Background

Chemical digestion of dietary carbohydrates, lipids and proteins occurs in several parts of the alimentary canal: the mouth, stomach, and small intestine. The enzymes involved are secreted by glands (eg: salivary, pancreas) or by epithelial cells of the digestive mucosa (eg: stomach, small intestine). Enzymatic proteins exhibit specificity and affinity; and their function is influenced by environmental conditions such as temperature and pH. Bile salts from the liver also contribute to chemical digestion, specifically, by emulsifying lipids in the small intestine. This results in greater efficiency of lipase enzymatic action.

In this lab, you will study the chemical digestion of carbohydrates and lipids. You will indirectly measure enzymatic activity by looking for the products of chemical digestion. As such, you will use three different indicators. The first is potassium iodide (IKI). IKI turns a dark, blue/black color in the presence of starch. The second indicator is Benedict's solution; a clear, bright blue solution of copper sulfate. When Benedict's solution is heated in the presence of a reducing sugar (eg: glucose), a precipitate of copper will form and the solution will change color. A mild positive reaction results in a green color change; whereas a stronger reaction will turn the solution orange or brick red. The third indicator you will use is the pH indicator litmus. Litmus is blue or purple in a basic solution and it is pink or red in an acid solution.

Procedure

Supplies:

- 0.5% amylase solution
- 0.5% starch solution
- 37° C water bath
- Hot water (boiling) pot
- Ice bath
- Benedict's solution (or glucose test strips)
- Lugol's solution (or IKI)
- Spot plates
- Test tubes (10/group)
- Wax pencils, parafilm, test tube holder
