

How Does Congress Work?

To understand the importance of Congress, you first need to know what this governing body is all about. Congress is the legislative branch of the U.S. government. It is made up of two houses: The House of Representatives and the Senate.

The House of Representatives (often referred to as just "the House") consists of 435 lawmakers, each of whom represents a district in a state. The House divides representation according to state population; the larger the population of a state, the more districts it has, and the more representatives it has in the House. For example, Alaska, Delaware, North Dakota, and Wyoming—states with smaller populations—each have one representative. California, with its large population, has 53 representatives. Officials study the results of the United States Census, which is conducted every 10 years, to determine how many people live in each district. Sometimes, districts will be re-mapped to ensure that no single lawmaker represents too many or too few people.

Unlike the House of Representatives, the Senate does not divide representation according to population. Every state, regardless of population, has two lawmakers in the Senate, for a grand total of 100 senators. (The framers of the Constitution decided on this equal representation in order to ensure that states with smaller populations would not be overpowered in the Legislature.)

The main function of the House of Representatives and the Senate is to create and pass legislation.
