Abstract

Results of candidates' level of achievement in physics tests being conducted by public examining bodies show that candidates are not doing well in these public examinations. One of the reasons for the low level achievement in physics may be due to faulty test items that are being administered to candidates each year. The use of faulty items may be as a result of not conducting thorough analysis of these items before they are administered to candidates. In this study, therefore, the author examined the role of item analysis in detecting faulty items and in improving the quality of physics objective test items.

Physics Paper 2 (PP2) of 2012 West Africa Examination Council consisting of 50 multiple choice items was administered to 900 senior secondary school three students (Age 16-18 years), who were randomly selected from 18 senior secondary schools in Osun Educational Zone I, Oyo State, and Ibadan Local Government Area, Osun State, Nigeria. Specifically the difficulty and discriminating indices of each of the 50 items in PP2 were determined. Analyses of the students' responses to the 50-item PP2 were carried out using both Classical Test Theory and Item Response Theory. Results of the analysis showed that some of the items were faulty in that their difficulty indices were very high and some items could not discriminate between high achievers and low achievers.

These results imply that public examining bodies should carry out thorough analysis of their test items before they are administered to their candidates. More importantly the results of the analysis should be communicated to physics teachers so that they can use the information to clarify some concepts that may be confusing to students in physics.

Keywords: Difficulty index, Discriminating index, Item response theory, Classical test theory, Physics objective test.

1. Introduction

Probably, most physics teachers as well as item writers for public examining bodies construct the tests they give secondary school students with little thought that a detailed analysis of the test items might result in their improvement. This is because a cursory look at some past question papers of major examining bodies reveals that year in year out, the same faulty items are repeated with little or no modification to the items as well as the options. It is quite unfortunate that some physics teachers instead of developing their own test items are afraid to use the faulty past questions of the public examining bodies, in their school-based examinations. No wonder, the same poor results in public examinations are being recorded among secondary school students.

What are the characteristics of good test items? Good items should have optimum difficulty level and be able to discriminate between students who have learned more than those who have learned less. In general items that will yield reliable measurements are good items (Fidell, 2006). After all, without reliability, there is no hope for validity, and we must have valid measurements or we will be deceiving ourselves. A pertinent question arises here: How reliable and valid are the items that public examining bodies use in their secondary school certificate examinations? To what extent do these items discriminate between students who have learned more than others and those who have learned less? How difficult are these test items? Answers to these questions will help in determining the quality of these items and consequently improve them.

The major objective of this study, therefore, is to analyse item by item 2012 WAEC physics objective test. In order to do this, focus will be on difficulty and discrimination levels of each item. The results of these analyses will help physics teachers as well as item writers realize the need for analysing the responses of the examinees even at the end of the examination with a view to improving the quality of the test items.

Item analysis, according to Haladyna (1999) is a method of reviewing items on a test, both qualitatively and statistically, to ensure that they all meet minimum quality-control criteria. The difference between qualitative review and statistical analysis is that the former uses the expertise of content experts and test review boards to identify items that do not appear to meet minimum quality-control criteria. Such qualitative review is essential during item development when no data are available for quantitative analysis. A statistical analysis, such as item analysis, is conducted after items have been administered and real-world data are available for analysis. However, the objective of qualitative and statistical review is the same – to identify problematic items on the test. According to Viersma (2014) items may be problematic due to one or more of the following reasons:

- a) Items may be poorly written causing students to be confused when responding to them.

European Financial Regulation Veerle Colaert,Danny Busch,Thomas Incalza,2019-12-26 Mirroring the long established structure of the financial industry EU financial regulation as we know it today approaches banking insurance and investment services separately and often divergently In recent decades however the clear separation between financial sectors has gradually evaporated as business lines have converged across sectors and FinTech solutions have emerged which do not fit traditional sector boundaries As the contours of the traditional tripartition in the financial industry have faded the diverging regulatory and supervisory treatment of these sectors has become increasingly at odds with economic reality This book brings together insights developed by distinguished researchers and industry professionals in a series of articles analysing the main areas of EU financial regulation from a cross sectoral perspective For each specific research theme including prudential regulation corporate governance and conduct of business rules the similarities as well as gaps overlaps and unjustifiable differences between banking securities and insurance regulation are clearly presented and discussed This innovative research approach is aimed at informing lawmakers and policymakers on potential improvements to EU financial regulation whilst also supporting legal and compliance professionals applying the current framework or looking to streamline compliance processes
