

Conductors and Insulators

In order for electricity to be useful it must be able to travel from one place to another. Some materials allow electricity to pass through - these are called conductors. Some materials do not allow electricity to pass through - these are called insulators.

The most common types of conductors are materials that are made from metal. Metal is a great conductor! Copper, for example, is used for wiring in electrical circuits. This is no accident. Copper is used because it allows electricity to flow through it at a high speed. Water is also a great conductor. For this reason, it can be dangerous to use electrical devices around water.

Insulators on the other hand slow down or completely stop the flow of electricity. Materials such as rubber, glass, cotton, plastic and wood are all great examples of insulators.
