

While the name "children's entertainment" implies that the entertainment should only be enjoyed by children, that assumption is incorrect. Entertainment that is created for adult audiences uses the same types of media that children's entertainment uses, like animation and video games. Shows and movies that are created for children can also explore ideas and stories that are of interest to adults. In addition, adults may like to engage with media that reminds them of their own childhoods. The classification of a large group of media (animated shows, video games, and collectibles) as children's entertainment ignores the variety of audiences for that media as well as the numerous reasons adults may engage with it.

Many kinds of media that are used for children's entertainment can be used for adult audiences. Animated TV shows and films, along with video games, are not only created for children. Shows ranging from South Park to The Midnight Gospel use animation to entertain and discuss themes and ideas relevant to adults. Many video games are rated mature and are not suitable for children to play. Categorizing any animated show or video game as entertainment for children ignores the variety of content and audiences that those shows and games may have. Although shows and games may look similar to children's entertainment, it does not mean that those shows and games are childish.
