African American Christian Fiction:

Psycho Chick and Her God Marilyn Strong, 2018-05-16 Grave Mistakes Difficult Pathways Unwise Choices All Revealed In Marilyn Strong's New Book Actually I shot them both This simple line uttered as Madison Elisabeth is headed to a jail cell becomes the reason for a flashback to her earlier years and overall life How did she end up there Had it been all her fault Could she hope that she could be forgiven and spared Follow Madison's life a life that resembles a spiky road and leads her to despair as it seems she's been abandoned by everyone But is that really the case Or perhaps there's someone who never stopped looking after her Someone that truly loves her even though she repeatedly chose to stay away from Him Read this incredible e book not only will you love Madison and sympathize with her but you'll also be reminded that God is always present standing next to each one of us and ready to offer us deliverance all we need to do is ask Place Your Order Immerse Yourself In This Heart Wrenching Educational Story

Stronger Than Fiction Shewanda LaRue Riley, 2021 My primary goals with this dissertation are to take a close look at how contemporary African American Christian fiction performs important literary and cultural functions and explore how these works reinforce or subvert perceptions of the contemporary African American Christian woman The specific texts that I analyze are chosen from 1997-2007 the earliest time period of publication of contemporary African American Christian fiction as they set the tone for African American Christian fiction literary works that have been published since that time The primary research question driving this project is whether contemporary African American Christian fiction has literary and cultural merit Moreover this dissertation explores how the complicated depictions of the African American woman in contemporary African American Christian fiction intersect and disrupt the boundaries between race gender and religion The overall focus is how in doing so these literary works reinforce what some could label a problematic contemporary African American Christian feminist ethos I examine historical and cultural forces that led to the creation of this literature and how this literature reflects and in a greater sense reacts to those forces My argument is that despite the best of intentions of the primarily female authors in some instances fall victim to patriarchal hegemonic forces in their depictions of contemporary African American Christian women Though intended to be positive and empowering the characterizations and themes of contemporary African American Christian fiction undermine the original intent of the literature to inspire contemporary African American Christian women
