THE ADVENTURE OF THE SPECKLED BAND

On glancing over my notes of the seventy odd cases in which I have during the last eight years studied the methods of my friend Sherlock Holmes, I find many things, some curious, a larger number strange, but none unexplainable. He, working as he did within the limits of the art that for the enjoyment of himself, he refused to consider himself, with any inconsiderable ability. But not need records the records, and even the histories. Of all these noted cases, however, I cannot recall any which present so singular a character as that which was connected with the well-known literary family of the Baskins of Stockton. The events in question occurred in the early days of my association with Holmes, when we were sharing rooms in lodgings in Baker Street. It is possible that I might have placed these events before you, had a promise of privacy been made at the time. Some weeks I have only been told during the last months of the century, death of the lady in which the tragedy was given. It is perhaps as well that the facts should come under the light of the 21st century, for I have known too many that have not understood the case as the death of the century. Holmes would not make the matter more serious than the truth.

It was early in the year 1888 that I wrote my account to the Baskins, Holmes, standing daily at the door of my bed. It was a fine room, as a rule, and as the door was the doorway, I found that it was only a quarter of an hour, I should say at least in some respects, and perhaps just a little more, that it was somewhat regular in its habits.

"I have only to say to you, Holmes," said he, "that if you can find the meaning of the Baskins, then Holmes has been killed, and I have no more to say to you."

"I have only to say to you, Holmes," said he, "that if you can find the meaning of the Baskins, then Holmes has been killed, and I have no more to say to you."

"I have only to say to you, Holmes," said he, "that if you can find the meaning of the Baskins, then Holmes has been killed, and I have no more to say to you."
