

A WINTER WALK

By Henry David Thoreau (1842)

Protonoia

The wind has gently murmured through the blinds, or puffed with feathery softness against the windows, and occasionally sighed like a summer fly-flap lifting the leaves along, the long night. The meadow-mouse has slept in his snug gallery in the sod, the owl has sat in a hollow tree in the depth of the swamp, the rabbit, the squirrel, and the fox have all been housed. The watch-dog has lain quiet on the hearth, and the cattle have stood silent in their stalls. The earth itself has slept, as it were its first, not its last sleep, save when some street-sign or wood-house door has faintly creaked upon its hinge, showing Northern nature at her midnight work,—the only sound awake next Venus and Mars,—advertising us of a remote inward warmth, a divine cheer and fellowship, where gods are met together, but where it is very bleak for men to stand. But while the earth has slumbered, all the air has been alive with feathery flocks descending, as if some northern Queen reigned, showering her silvery grain over all the fields.

We sleep, and at length awake to the still reality of a winter morning. The snow lies warm, as cotton or down upon the window-sill, the broadened eads and frosted panes admit a dim and private light, which enhances the song cheer within. The stillness of the morning is impressive. The floor creaks under our feet as we move toward the window to look abroad through some clear space over the fields. We see the roofs stand under their snow burdens. From the eaves and fences hang stalactites of snow, and in the yard stand stalagmites covering some concealed core. The trees and shrubs rear white arms to the sky on every side, and where were walls and fences, we see fantastic forms stretching in frolic gambols across the dusky landscape, as if nature had strewn her fresh designs over the fields by night as models for man's art.

Silently we unlatch the door, letting the drift fall in, and step abroad to face the cutting air. Already the stars have lost some of their sparkle, and a dull, leaden mist skirts the horizon. A hard bronze light in the east proclaims the approach of day, while the western landscape is dim and spectral still, and clothed in a somber Tartarian light, like the shadowy realm. They are internal sounds only that you hear,—the crowing of cocks, the barking of dogs, the chopping of wood, the howling of winds, all seems to come from Nature's barn-yard and beyond the Urim,—not for any melancholy they suggest, but their bright beauty is too solemn and mysterious for earth. The recent tracks of the fox or otter, in the yard, remind us that each hour of the night is crowded with events, and the practical nature is still working and making tracks in the snow. Opening the gate, we tread briskly along the lone country road, crunching the dry and crusted snow under our feet, or aroused by the sharp clear creak of the wood-sled, just starting for the distant market, from the early farmer's door, where it
