of the individuals working around composite aircraft may have little or no specific training or familiarity with composites and their differences from metals This creates an opportunity for a common human factor Lack of Knowledge to affect their decisions and actions when reporting or investigating an aircraft damage event 2Experience with previous aircraft may lead to human factors Complacency and Norms which may prevent individuals from taking the actions necessary to properly address composite structure 3Individuals lacking proper training may not have the assertiveness to assess and report damage while operating under the stress pressure and fatigue common in the airline industry 4Incomplete reporting of composite damage leads to more iterations and time in damage assessment process All personnel working in the vicinity of a composite aircraft must be made aware of the importance of reporting all potential damage events to composite structure Once the event is reported it is the responsibility of the targeted audience to begin the assessment process which will be covered in this curriculum The use of composites in commercial aircraft requires proper training for identification assessment and reporting of accidental damage during operations The damage assessment process on composite structure may require the use of special inspection tools defined as NDI equipment specified by the appropriate technical manual intended for use by non NDT personnel Training to operate these tools the understanding of the composite structure configuration e g surface substructure taper regions and routine exposure to usage of the tools are key factors for effective damage assessment The targeted audience includes line maintenance technicians inspectors certifying staff that can release the aircraft and personnel evaluating the damage against Allowable Damage Limits ADLs
