Nightmares Charles Young,J. Sheridan Le Fanu,2018-03-17 DICKON THE DEVIL ABOUT thirty years ago I was selected by two rich old maids to visit a property in that part of Lancashire which lies near the famous forest of Pendle with which Mr Ainsworth s Lancashire Witches has made us so pleasantly familiar My business was to make partition of a small property including a house and demesne to which they had a long time before succeeded as coheireses The last forty miles of my journey I was obliged to post chiefly by cross roads little known and less frequented and presenting scenery often extremely interesting and pretty The picturesqueness of the landscape was enhanced by the season the beginning of September at which I was travelling I had never been in this part of the world before I am told it is now a great deal less wild and consequently less beautiful At the inn where I had stopped for a relay of horses and some dinner for it was then past five o clock I found the host a hale old fellow of five and sixty as he told me a man of easy and garrulous benevolence willing to accommodate his guests with any amount of talk which the slightest tap sufficed to set flowing on any subject you pleased I was curious to learn something about Barwyke which was the name of the demesne and house I was going to As there was no inn within some miles of it I had written to the steward to put me up there the best way he could for a night The host of the Three Nuns which was the sign under which he entertained wayfarers had not a great deal to tell It was twenty years or more since old Squire Bowes died and no one had lived in the Hall ever since except the gardener and his wife Tom Wyndsour will be as old a man as myself but he s a bit taller and not so much in flesh quite said the fat innkeeper But there were stories about the house I repeated that they said prevented tenants from coming into it Old wives tales many years ago that will be sir I forget em I forget em all Oh yes there always will be when a house is left so foolish folk will always be talkin but I han t heard a word about it this twenty year It was vain trying to pump him the old landlord of the Three Nuns for some reason did not choose to tell tales of Barwyke Hall if he really did as I suspected remember them I paid my reckoning and resumed my journey well pleased with the good cheer of that old world inn but a little disappointed We had been driving for more than an hour when we began to cross a wild common and I knew that this passed a quarter of an hour would bring me to the door of Barwyke Hall The peat and furze were pretty soon left behind we were again in the wooded scenery that I enjoyed so much so entirely natural and pretty and so little disturbed by traffic of any kind I was looking from the chaise window and soon detected the object of which for some time my eye had been in search Barwyke Hall was a large quaint house of that cage work fashion known as black and white in which the bars and angles of an oak framework contrast black as ebony with the white plaster that overspreads the masonry built into its interstices This steep roofed Elizabethan house stood in the midst of park like grounds of no great extent but rendered imposing by the noble stature of the old trees that now cast their lengthening shadows eastward over the sward from the declining sun The park wall was gray with age and in many places laden with ivy In deep gray shadow that contrasted with the dim fires of evening reflected on the foliage above it in a gentle hollow stretched a lake that looked cold and black and seemed as it were to skulk from observation with a guilty knowledge
