These authors have suggested that, by increasing water availability over its range throughout the watershed, the water management could be considered the ideal intervention. However, since increased water availability may encourage more agricultural production that could result in soil erosion, the authors suggest that a combination of water management, soil conservation, and forest management would be the best approach to the water crisis in the study area. In general, the authors suggest that water management, soil conservation, and forest management should be given the greatest priority in addressing the water crisis in the study area.

The above three activities are interconnected and could be done in parallel to streamline the process.
