Abstract:

Inadequately purified water for hemodialysis (HD) treatments have led to many documented patient injuries and deaths. Although nurses may not be servicing the water treatment system, they are nonetheless responsible for understanding all the clinical ramifications of water treatment for HD. This article offers information on water treatment components used for HD applications, including the latest AAMI standards.

Full Text:

Goal:

To describe the function of the majority of the water treatment components used for hemodialysis applications.

Objectives:

1. List key components in a water treatment system for hemodialysis patients.
2. Identify clinical manifestations in hemodialysis patients exposed to inadequately purified water or contaminated dialysate.
3. Discuss issues involved with the maintenance of a water treatment system, the importance of water quality monitoring, and bacterial assays.

Many documented hemodialysis (HD) patient injuries and deaths are associated with inadequately purified water for the HD treatment. Table 1 describes potential clinical symptoms of using inadequately purified water. It is estimated that many more incidences go unreported because the chronic symptoms, like bone disease, can be insidious and relegated to problems secondary to ESRD unless a patient exhibits an acute or subacute reaction. Nurses may not be servicing the water treatment system, but nurses are responsible for understanding all the clinical ramifications of water treatment for hemodialysis and piecing together the entire picture. Although historically the water treatment system is the technicians' domain, knowing the technical aspects in order to work together is best for the patients' ultimate well-being.

More than 90% of dialysate is water. The more pure the water, the more accurate the dialysate prescription delivered. Companies who sell water purification devices are regulated by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA). Water treatment systems, dialysis machines, and ancillary devices are mandated as Class II medical devices by the FDA. Class I encompasses loosely regulated items such as band-aids and tongue depressors; Class III stringently regulates devices like high-flux hemodialyzers and implantable items such as pace makers.
