Do you hate segregation? Well you know how people got rid of segregation? With the collective minds of imagination!!!! As Jeff Chang once said, "Every moment of major social change requires a collective leap of imagination. Change presents itself in not only spontaneous and organized expressions of unrest and riot, but in explosions of mass creativity". And during times of segregation, Martin Luther King expressed in his speech how he one day believed that American segregation would end. Chang's quote of social change, involving the use of imagination is true because firstly, in order to push social change to impact others, one must imagine such change occurring. Secondly, When someone imagines something the mainly when it relates to a type of social change, people are the ones who push for these ideas to occur. Action is what may lead to change rather than imagination though.

How is it possible for one to create such an impactful change on society when you yourself can't imagine such thing to even happen? Both students and teachers thought out this protest thoroughly. How? Well using their imagination. Both groups saw a future in which teachers would receive a 20% raise. This shows that when a groups of people gather together to create social change for a good cause, they put their heads together and imagine the impossible or the unexpected.

Despite the conditions one may be faced with, it's best to fight for what is right. And women are in the right. During WW2 it was just the beginning of women's rights. Back then women weren't allowed to do much. But, this would soon change. Women decided to finally come together as one and overcome the social norms society has on them, but this was mainly pointed toward working women. It was unfair that those who truly had to work and take care of their only priority being their children, were shamed for it. These women organized protests and in fact managed to create a declaration known as the "Declaration of Sentiments" and have it officially signed, finally stating that all men and women were created equally. This shows that regardless of gender both men and women or
