

Due to the violence and graphic depictions of horror on television and in everyday life, each person responds to the unknown in a way that depends on how they react to fear and how much they can tolerate it. While children are more susceptible to the effects caused by exposure to graphic and disturbing images rather than adults, both over time experience desensitization as a long-term effect to the macabre depictions of violence and the unknown shown in cinemas and television.

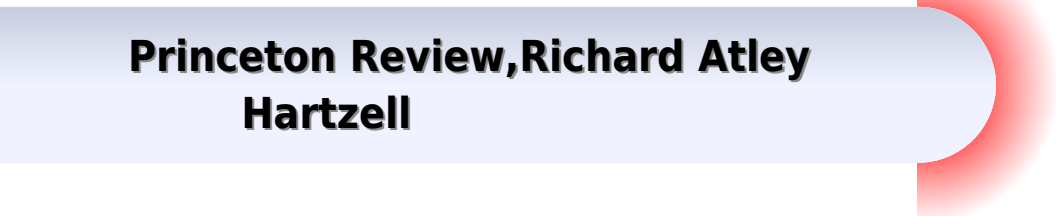

Children, unlike adults, are more likely to succumb to violent depictions of horror in cinema. Furthermore, seeing these violent acts performed on television, children have a hard time depicting imagination from reality. As such, the inability to distinguish between both worlds allows the child to believe whatever he sees on television to be true. The Victoria Advocate highlights the effect gore has on children and states, "The younger a child is when he is allowed to view a horror film, the stronger the lasting effects." Some of these effects include sleepless nights or sleep with nightmares, as well as loss of appetite. There is also the added concern that film recently has displayed more graphic and gory scenes of violence than what has been typically displayed in the past. Ultra-realistic modern gore coupled with the fact that children have underdeveloped brains has made children susceptible to cinematic gore now more so than ever. The effects of this exposure can be long lasting and can follow children way into adulthood. According the Victoria Advocate, this explains why some adults have unexplained irrational fears such as fear of clowns or fear of the dark.

Adults, unlike children, have fully developed brains and are thus less susceptible to long term negative effects that exposure to the macabre and unknown may bring. In fact, Jen Christensen wrote an article about how the effects of horror movies and scaring yourself can be actually beneficial. Watching violence can also help adults ground themselves in reality if they watch violence scenes with other adults. Christensen quotes Goldstein who states that "going as a group helps ground you in reality [because] you can compare your reactions with others and show others that you are strong enough to take it." Not all adults have positive reactions to visual representations of horror, however. Christensen states that some adults can become overstimulated to fictional scares. Others can continue to be traumatized due to earlier exposure as children. While adults may be better equipped to handle these graphic depictions of violence and gore than children can overall, there are still some negative effects that such exposure to horror as adults can elicit.

Lastly, the American Psychological Association conducted a study of "consistently disturbing" findings and their effects on a younger audience. As stated above, it is most apparent that children have a harder time depicting imagination from reality and therefore are more susceptible to long-term negative effects than adults are, but what are some other possible effects horror can inflict on a child? The Institute of Mental Health identified that
