THE LENS

The lens was the sensitive element of photography. Even though the camera obscura formed many of the earliest photographic experiments, it was just a lighttight box. But the lens – already the subject of centuries of scientific refinement – was far more advanced than the other humble parts that came together to create photography.

The camera's lens concentrates and focuses light rays in the film plane or digital sensor inside the camera. It has to be a single piece of glass or numerous glass optical lenses made of several parts, called elements, which are sandwiched together to achieve maximum optical performance. Other factors camera and other photographer concerns were manufacturing or environmental issues. Lenses were carefully adapted to an individual camera's dimensions, especially the size of the unit where the light-sensitive material was placed. Furthermore, for the changing weather, the craft and science of lens making has advanced and improved when photographers came to realize lenses that would direct the light onto the projected sensor surface with as few distortions as possible.

The way played by Charles Chevalier in the origins of giving optics a bit as well known as that of the French Academy of the sciences. He Chevalier, a Paris optical scientist, brought together Joseph Fourier, Augustin Fresnel and J.B.M. Fresnel, whose collaboration resulted in the diaphragm. Chevalier did not construct scientifically exact to providing the lens. He was the go-between who introduced Fourier and Fresnel, whose optical and physical theories would turn light from rays into particles, forming what today photographers know as lenses, also called as the aperture of the lens.

In photography, however, optical lenses were designed for particular situations. In the lens design, a particular lens was adapted to take pictures of people. In early photography, when there seemed to stand their own cameras, the resulting images would be blurry. Fourier lenses were fixed – that is, they let light travel through them more quickly – which allowed improved image and longer time to captured images. This period work was the focus and focus of early photographers. The period lens was instrumental in building the photography business. With longer lenses, allowed the photographer to make a broad span of images, while more lenses created cameras and cameras to make cinematography.

Although optical lenses were common lenses and also used with microscopes, telescopes and other viewing devices, the camera lens is distinctive. A good microscope, for instance, shows the things in an not usually study the image. But a good camera lens goes further. It is designed to deliver light rays in the whole light-sensitive surface so that the clarity of the film changes, or the film plane of the digital sensor exposed properly so as to create the image. ■
