Video Games

Children of all ages spend hours every day playing video games and both parents and educators are struggling to understand the reason (41) The most obvious answer is that children simply enjoy themselves while playing. Another reason might (42) that most games are designed around reward systems, which children are attracted (43) because such positive reinforcement (44) them feel good and proud of themselves. However, (45) is not the easy games that children are most fascinated by, but the challenging ones that take time to learn, explore and master. While playing, children are so absorbed in the game (46) they take no notice of time passing or what's going on around them. Apart from (47) fun, however, video game play helps children enhance their thinking skills and build up their knowledge. That is why numerous computer and tablet games (48) now integrated into learning programmes, allowing teachers to monitor the reading and maths skills of students. (49) the educational value these games may have, many psychologists insist that children should be warned about the effects these games can (50) on their health and relationships if they are played excessively.
