

Abstract

This paper offers a new method to the high-tech writing profession by exploring the student-teacher, student-student, and student-writing interactions that should develop properly within an online training course to empower students to learn and develop new skills. This new method emerges commonly in debates encompassing distant study or online instruction, but has never been closely administered to educating high-tech communications via the Internet. Specifically, this paper analyzes 12 methods for each communication style and employs research in both the technological communication field and the distance education field. This paper provides a combination of principles and modes, but it centers more on effective strategies so that new teachers can use them immediately for online teaching. This paper specifies "online instruction" or "online teaching" as the method of teaching online material remotely to students who are connected via the Internet and not present with the teacher. This type of teaching can happen in real-time or at a separate time.
