

Essay Example on Leukemia: A Deadly Blood Cancer Affecting All Ages Essay

Introduction

Leukemia is a melanoma of the blood or the bone marrow which is responsible for the production of blood cells. It develops due to a problem with the white blood cells and is most likely to affect older people with age above 55 years. However, it also affects young people below the age of 15 years. The cancer is lethal, with estimated deaths being reported in the twentieth of thousands in the United States of America. Its acute form develops rapidly worsening by the days, but chronic is quite slow. The disease is a result of damages on the DNA of developing leucocytes, another name for the white blood cells. The resultant is the uncontrolled division and growth of the cells. Science has it that healthy blood cells die after performing their functions and are replaced by new ones from the bone marrow. This is not the case with the defective white blood cells because they instead build in number and occupy more space. The production of more blood cells crowds the blood preventing the normal functioning of the healthy blood cells, which are eventually outnumbered.

There are several risk factors for this particular cancer of the blood. Artificial ionizing radiation is significant factor leukemia, which the patient may have undergone during the treatment of another cancer. There are also certain viruses, which have been linked to the development of cancer. One such virus is the human T-lymphotropic virus (HTLV-1), which has been associated with Leukemia by scientists. Other risk factors include chemotherapy, exposure to benzene, and presence of underlying genetic conditions such as Down syndrome, which increases the leukemia risks in children. The family history of people with Leukemia could also be a risk for Leukemia in related families. There are also other risk factors of the disease. It is significant to note that the kind of treatment depends on the nature of Leukemia that the patient is suffering from.

Treatment of Leukemia

Treatment of Leukemia by Chemotherapy

The method is comprised of giving several medications to the patient, where each medication brings destruction to the tumor cells in various ways. The destroyed cells become vulnerable to treatment. Chemotherapy is usually given orally in the form of a pill or intravenously. It may also be delivered intrathecally into the cerebrospinal fluid, a treatment procedure targeted at the cancer cells present in the brain and the spinal cord. Ports are placed into patients to deliver the chemotherapy, give fluids, and draw blood samples; this is aimed to lessen the discomfort from pricks by needles. Throughout the process, regular blood tests and other tests are done to check for the defective cells and make necessary modifications in the treatment process.

The most common treatment of acute Leukemia by chemotherapy starts with induction to the process, which is caused by intensification or consolidation, and, lastly, the chemotherapy itself. The induction process, as observed above, involves giving a combination of drugs to weaken the cells and bring the blood concentration to be normal (Kantarjian et al., 2017). The intensification process is
