About The Atomic Clock

The main unit has a special receiving device that picks up an AM radio signal broadcasted by the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) in Fort Collins, Colorado. The signal is generated from the official U.S. atomic clock that is the most accurate timekeeping device in the world. The AM radio signal transmits the exact hour, minute and second of the day. The main unit automatically seeks for the time signal once a day (2:00 AM) to update to the exact time. Use any AM radio signal; this unit's signal acquisition is susceptible to interference such as being surrounded by heavy concrete or steel/jarred. The reception of the time signal is also greatly affected by electrical or electronic interference. To get the best performance, place the main unit near a window.

BEST RECEPTION LOCATIONS: Some electronic appliances, such as computers, TVs, fluorescent lights, microwave ovens, power lines, and metal siding walls can interfere with the time and temperature signal transmissions to the main unit. Try to place each unit at least 3 feet from these objects or near a window for optimum performance.

Daylight Saving Time (DST):

The atomic clock will automatically adjust to DST and back to standard time. By default, the feature is set to "ON" during initial set up to make the time change. For areas not observing DST in the summer, hold the "HOUR" button located on the back of the main unit for 3 seconds to turn the DST feature off.

Manual Search for the Atomic Time Signal:

If the atomic time signal has not been automatically received within 24 hours, hold the "SET" button and release to activate the signal search. The lower icon will begin to flash. The "OK" icon will appear next to the lower icon once the signal is acquired.
