

ADAPTIVE RADIATION: MAMMALIAN FORELIMBS

The variety of forelimbs - the bat's wing, the sea lion's flipper, the elephant's supportive column, the human's arm and hand - further illustrates the similar anatomical plan of all mammals due to a shared ancestry. Despite the obvious differences in shape, mammalian forelimbs share a similar arrangement and arise from the same embryonic, homologous structures.

The mammalian forelimb includes the shoulder, elbow, and wrist joints. The scapula or shoulder blade connects the forelimb to the trunk and forms part of the shoulder joint. The humerus or upper arm bone forms part of the shoulder joint above, and elbow joint below. The radius and ulna comprise the lower arm bones or forearm, and contribute to the elbow and wrist joints. Finally, the carpal or wrist bones, the metacarpals, and phalanges form the bat wing, the sea lion flipper, the tree shrew, mole, and wolf paws, the elephant foot, and the human hand and fingers.

Using light colors, begin with the tree shrew scapula in the center of the plate. Next, color the scapula on each of the other animals: the mole, bat, wolf, sea lion, elephant, and human.

Continue coloring the other bones in this manner: humerus, radius, ulna, carpal bones, metacarpals, and phalanges.

After you have colored all the structures in each animal, notice the variation in the overall shape of the forelimb. Notice, too, how the form of the bones contributes to the function of the forelimb in each species.

The tree shrew skeleton closely resembles that of early mammals and represents the ancestral forelimb skeleton. The tree shrew is small bodied, moves easily on the ground or in the trees, and has a flexible forelimb for these functions.

The mole's forelimb is relatively short and lies close to the body, giving it a somewhat streamlined shape. The shovel-like paw comprises almost half the length of the limb. The slender rod-like scapula and the short, peculiarly shaped humerus help anchor the forelimb against the trunk and draw the paws very near to the head. The elbow joint is rotated so that the paws face backward. Powerful muscles attach on the long bony olecranon process; they straighten the elbow joint and help the paws dig and push the soil out to the side. The robust metacarpals and phalanges give strength to the paw and an extra bone (the falciform) adds breadth. Thus, the forelimb is well suited for the mole to dig its way through moist soil as it searches for insects.

The bat's forelimb is adapted for flight. The humerus is short relative to the longer, slender radius; the ulna is reduced and not part of the wrist joint. The metacarpals and phalanges provide a light but strong frame over which the skin is stretched, much as the silk of a kite covers its frame.

The wolf is a swift runner, the better to pursue prey. Its humerus, radius, and ulna are relatively long and make possible a long stride. In marked contrast to those of the bat, the metacarpals are closely packed together for bearing weight. The wolf walks somewhat up on its toes, on bent phalanges.

For its life in the water and on land, the sea lion has a broad scapula, short and robust humerus, radius, and ulna. The scapula and humerus lie within the body cavity and so help streamline the ani-
