I Am an Only Child

According to psychologists, I am labeled "a syndrome". An only child. It is said that only children are lonely, selfish, spoiled and impatient. Whilst some of these personality traits may be true, isn't everyone the smallest bit selfish and impatient? Everyone feels lonely sometimes, it's not just something that's specific to only children. Everything that is said about single children are myths as even people with 7 brothers and sisters can be selfish. Everyone has certain personality traits although I do admit that sometimes they can come across worse when you're the only child. I can be selfish as I have never had to share with other children and so I'm not used to it.

The absence of any siblings has given me a deeper craving for close relationships with my friends. They become my family. I am extremely cautious when it comes to choosing friends due to a bad experience in the past. I was bullied by a girl and I didn't even realise until 3 years later when I had more of an understanding of what was happening. The bullying was sometimes very subtle but often blatant - direct derogatory comments, deliberate exclusion even accusing me of being a bully. I was left with my blood boiling and completely bewildered after those words which were uttered.

Coincidentally, she is an only child too. It made me more cautious with the people I socialise with. I constantly have my guard up and am slightly suspicious when meeting potential new friends. Happily, I am now in a place where I can recognise who my loyal friends are and how much I need them in my life. They take my mind off of the difficult and painful times that occur in life even if it's just for a day or a five minute phone call. When my group are together there is never a dull moment and we support each other in everything we do. I have a close relationship with my best friend as we spend lots of time together and we have lots in common. I guess you could say that she is the closest thing I have to a sister, the only difference being is that we never fight or argue and we don't have to compete for attention.

Most of my friends have siblings and so sometimes I feel different as I can't relate. They speak about them regularly and I just listen. I understand that some people have strained relationships with their siblings but all of my friends are really close with theirs. When they are bored at home they can just go to the room next door to speak to them and they always have something to do. It does make me wish I had a brother or sister when they speak about the good times they have together. However, when they tell me about issues such as them not taking to their siblings friends or partners I don't envy them one bit. I would rather just keep myself to myself and not have to worry about my brother's girlfriend not being my favourite person in the world and bumping into them awkwardly in the house.

When I inform people that I am an only child the conversation
