

CHAPTER ONE

ACCOUNTING FOR RECEIVABLES

1.1 Introduction

Receivables Defined

- 1. Receivables include all money claims against other parties, including principal amounts due, and other obligations. Receivables are usually a liquidated portion of the total company assets.

Common Receivables

- 2. Accounts receivable are amounts that customers owe the company for goods sold, purchases of services, or amounts due through contract agreements arising from their agreement with the company's customers/suppliers.
- 3. Sales tax receivable are generally collected within short periods of the sale. They are considered receivables since they usually appear on balance sheets before their term has matured and become due.
- 4. They are non-current assets — except in companies that sell them.

Notes Receivable

- 5. Notes receivable are amounts owed by the company by customers in relation to the loans repaid through promissory notes or other debt instruments of other parties. They are used for credit periods ranging from one month and the longer period of twelve months.
- 6. Promissory notes have the advantage of being legally enforceable in company's legal action against those who fail to pay the amounts. They are also used to fund those companies' receivables through their creditworthiness based on their financial condition.
- 7. Notes that are due to the bank or bank and commercial parties, notes, and notes that are due to other than the bank are considered long-term assets.

NOTE: Accounts receivable and notes receivable that arise from company sales are collectively current receivables. The difference refers to period of collection in terms of the company's current receivables are receivables and notes that have different and longer periods and companies (large amounts, longer terms to companies) and notes to other companies (smaller amounts, shorter to companies). It represents that current receivables are usually listed as separate categories on the balance sheet. However, each type of current receivable has different risk factors and liquidity characteristics.

- 8. Receivables of all types are usually reported on the balance sheet at their net realizable value, which is the amount the company expects to receive through

1.2 Characteristics of Notes Receivable

- 9. It is a negotiable instrument issued by a bank.
