

Abstract

My experiment's purpose was to compare the growth rates of a salt crystal and sugar crystal. I chose this experiment because I was interested in why and how these crystals were formed; I also wanted to know how these two crystals were different. I had two hypotheses based on these questions they were; if the growth of a sugar crystal is related to its solubility, then the sugar crystal will be larger than the salt crystal. My other hypothesis was; if the growth of a salt crystal is related to the process of ionic bonding, then the salt crystal will grow faster. I had considerable challenges throughout the process of harvesting these crystals. First, I used nylon string instead of cotton; therefore the crystals would not grow. Once I solved that issue, I saw the sugar crystal was not growing while the salt one had already been growing continuously. Despite efforts taken to make the crystal grow, no matter how many times I started over or reheated the water while adding more sugar, the crystal never grew. Because of this, I was unable to compare the growth of the two crystals but I was able to learn more about the process in which the salt crystal grew and other aspects of science. These included learning about ionic bonds, and capillary action. Salt crystals have many purposes in everyday life that people are unaware of like de-icing roads, providing an excellent source of trace minerals for livestock, curing hide, drilling for oil, softening water and stabilizing roads. These have now become necessary in our society and if we learn how they form, it will lead to learning how to speed up the process of creating them in order to provide more salt crystals for tasks that are impossible without them.
