

The Harp

Harps have existed for around five thousand years. There are paintings of harps in tombs in Ancient Egypt. It's an instrument used in many cultures around the world.

26

Every harp shares some similar characteristics. Each one has a hollow section called a sound box. A branch or piece of wood sticks out of the sound box. This piece is called the string arm. The string arm and sound box make an angle like the letter V.

76

Strings are stretched from the sound box to the string arm. Imagine that letter V. The strings near the point are shorter than the strings going across the wide opening. The shorter strings have a higher pitch. Longer strings sound lower. To play, the harpist plucks the strings with their fingers.

127

Thousands of years ago, harps were small and simple. They could be carried easily. In the Middle Ages, musicians wanted more strings on their harps. They also wanted a louder sound. For these changes to work, the harp needed a new part.

169

Think of that V again. Now turn it on its side. A piece of wood was attached across the opening. It was called the pillar. The pillar made the harp string very strong. It kept the harp from breaking from all those strings pulling on it. So the boxes became larger, too. The larger sound gave the harp louder volume.
