Now that we know what a virus is, let's look at what it takes to call something a living thing. There are numerous characteristics that all living things have in common. First, living things are made up of units called cells. All cells, no matter how simple or complex, have a cytoplasm and genetic material that is enclosed by a phospholipid bilayer called the cell membrane. These structures of a cell are essential for organisms to maintain stable conditions, a process which we call homeostasis of living things. Furthermore, living things have a metabolism found in plants, animals, and microorganisms. Tissues make up organs. Different organs work together for the organism as a whole. Viruses do have the ability and genetic material. Nonetheless, they are not made up of cells and are not able to maintain homeostasis on their own.

Viruses are able to sustain life, growing, and reproducing. The difference is, however, viruses do these things by using the host cell.
